Located at the end of a ridge above two steep canyons, this home straddles a natural ridge line at the end of a narrow street creating a threshold between the public street and the private space beyond. The design implements both transparency and opacity to carefully curate the entry procession, capturing breathtaking views while selectively screening others. The residence, consisting of a series of stacked volumes, appears to cascade down the hillside creating a variety of outdoor terraces showcasing the 180-degree view from Downtown Los Angeles to Westwood. These volumes, composed of heavy concrete walls, are countered by full height glass openings and delicately louvered wood screens. Water features and landscaping are strategically placed amongst the volumes softening the experience transitioning through the spaces with rippling sound, subtle reflection, and natural beauty.
